A team of American and Italian researchers led by Dr. Cristina Civello, from the University of Padova in Italy, decided to find out with their Feelgood database. Their first research question asked, "Is feeling good as important as being good?" The researchers found that people who are seen as morally good feel happier and are less prone to commit violent crimes than those who are perceived as being morally bad. To find out about the impact of being good, the researchers looked at data on 10,655 adolescents in the United States. They completed questionnaires that included questions about their degree of moral goodness, their satisfaction with life, and their propensity for committing violent crimes. After analyzing the answers, they found that those who were viewed as good were happier and more satisfied with life, even when other variables were taken into account. Those who were considered good were less likely to commit violent crimes. "When a child is seen as a good person, he is likely to be peaceful and less inclined to engage in antisocial behavior," said Dr. Civello. The same relationship held true among adult subjects, who were given questionnaires in the Italian city of Pisa. The researchers asked 61 men and 67 women to complete the same questionnaires used with the adolescents. The women were all in heterosexual relationships, and they were asked to think about a romantic partner and a casual lover. The men were asked to think about the previous day's interactions with their girlfriend. When all the data was analyzed, it was found that women who thought their partners were good were more satisfied with their lives and felt less inclined to commit violent crimes. They also had more satisfaction with their current and future romantic relationships. Among the men, the results were the same for their current relationships and casual sex. "When people in a relationship think of the other partner as a good person, they tend to feel better about themselves, and are less likely to be violent," said Dr. Civello. Because their study was observational, the researchers were careful to point out that their findings were not causal. "It is possible that someone who is good-natured might be more likely to be perceived as such by others, or that people who are good are generally seen as such," said Dr
