

Via Powershell: via the DISM CLI via the VHD Imager With massive controversy and high expectations, the second “live” game between the Boston Red Sox and St. Louis Cardinals on Sunday night went down in baseball history as being historic. Cardinals outfielder Allen Craig was involved in a bench-clearing brawl with Red Sox starter Jon Lester, who beat the Cardinals 8-3 to take a commanding 4-0 lead in the ALDS. A lot of things could have been said about Craig and Lester’s frustration with a blown call by umpire Mark Wegner, and their subsequent confrontation, but perhaps the most damning of all was Craig’s postgame reaction: Very clearly, Lester came to the plate with intent to be the aggressor. Craig — a poor hitter and an even worse outfielder — was the one that struck the first blow, and it was deserved. I know Lester didn't like how it all played out. He didn't like the ball being called dead, or how Wegner appeared to have the situation reversed by ruling Lester out when he clearly wasn't. But it's not Lester's fault. Craig had a bad day, and he'll never hit a baseball so cleanly that he can still be on first base with his bat still in his hands. What Lester did, though, was do what every starting pitcher should do when confronted by an umpire's mistake:
