Habibie wanted to focus his efforts on getting things done rather than on the niceties of government, but an archaic system left him at the mercy of colleagues. The system required a State Committee (MPRS) to approve all laws before they became law. This was mainly done by the Cabinet, which was dominated by the Muslim community.

Consequently, Habibie found himself playing second fiddle to another Muslim minister, Abdurrahman Wahid. The president's grip on power weakened further when he was faced with the possibility of losing a referendum in which Indonesians were asked to endorse a new constitution. The Muslim community viewed the constitution as an affront to their religion and they wanted a say in deciding whether the document was acceptable or not. The MPRS eventually forced a popular vote by having people sign a petition, which had been manipulated by the opposition. However, the referendum took place in September 1998 and the people voted overwhelmingly in favour of the new constitution. In the end, Habibie won the respect of the country by holding a national consultation to find a compromise between his country's new constitution and the needs of the Islamic community. } } else { // start of
