[image] Thank you for watching ? Yes and no. I'm an intergalactic trader. We never know what the outcome will be when we put on an investment. However, there are a handful of traders that have a proven track record of getting their systems to fail and to win. I'm sure you've heard about successful traders like Jesse Livermore, Burton Malkiel, and Jim Rogers. (This last one is my personal hero). These people all had great track records. They knew what to do and when to put on positions. Unfortunately for the rest of us we aren't as well-versed in these strategies and suffer from a lack of knowledge, and those tend to be the traders that lose money, right? ? Sure, you might be a smart guy. You might have an edge in whatever you do, but what I'm telling you is that trading, at least the way we talk about it, is an unsystematic and unscientific endeavor. What I'm trying to do here is tell you that you're likely to find a trader (or any other person) that is more successful than you are, but they only do it because they're lucky, or they don't know what they're doing. Maybe they got lucky, and you're the one that's going to get it wrong. (This is why the market is moving in one direction and then is moving in another). There's a joke I like to use when I'm having a conversation about the markets that has gotten me in trouble in the past, "Your opinion is more important than any knowledge you might have. If you don't understand the markets, no one's opinion is any more valuable than yours." The only people that should be arguing about this are the people that know what they're talking about, or perhaps, the people that are lying about what they do. (And I'm not talking about lies like "I'm with the government", or "I'm a financial advisor"). The rest of us don't know what we're talking about, so we're going to fight about it. I don't know if you'll be a successful trader or not, but what I can tell you, is that you're probably not a trader that is successful. In other words, if you were to just randomly try trading, you're probably not going to succeed. However, if you had a guide, a mentor, or a friend that could help you, you'd probably have a
