So, how do we know the truth about the way that things work? As it turns out, not well. The internet works on the basis of trust—but with a lot of the internet, that trust is not so easy to come by. Take the domain name system, for example. Domains are the keys to the internet, and the internet is a pretty complicated place. Imagine trying to go to a site like omg.com, and you're greeted with a bit of misdirection. Instead of the home page, you get a notice that the domain name has been sold, but don't worry, the good folks at omg.com have provided you with this address instead: at-2.cdn.turner.com. That's because omg.com is actually at-2.cdn.turner.com, owned by a company called Network Solutions. So, what's a CDN? Well, a company like Network Solutions buys domains, and they're like real estate; they have to actually own the real estate to be able to sell it. Network Solutions bought omg.com, then passed it along to someone else, who in turn sold it to a different company, and that company resold it to omg.com. That's a simplified version of how the internet works. And even if you're an internet veteran, it might not be the most intuitive way to explain things. It took three companies to sell the domain omg.com before someone could buy it and change it to a new site. And even if you were on the network and you were able to talk to the person that owned the domain and found out where the domain was coming from, you'd have no way of knowing who they actually owned the domain from—because they might have sold it to two different companies along the 1d6a3396d6
