Pull in the world of our patients through the eyes of a retired surgeon. A place where parents can turn and a better future without drugs. The middle name of a city. The name of an ancient country and the country that many Americans wish we could have back. Those who can afford it, and those who cannot, spend part of their lives in a city. Stitches in the city is where people turn to remember a childhood, a time when a future was possible. Tell a story. Show the world what we stood for. That is the purpose of the Stitches in the City Project. Show us.Numerous attempts have been made in the past to design a broadcast or cable television antenna which would be capable of receiving broadcast signals, but which would also be capable of offering some increased versatility as to signal reception. One type of antenna which has been heretofore designed is the so-called reflector antenna which is normally mounted directly on a vertical wall of a room and which comprises a spherical radiating element from which the television signals are received. This type of antenna has an inherent distortion problem. That is, because it is mounted directly on a vertical surface, the antenna is subject to parallax, that is, the television signals received by the antenna can be skewed off-horizontal. Another type of antenna which has been used heretofore comprises a reflector antenna which is mounted near the bottom of a window and which is supported by a horizontal stanchion which is inserted into the window. This type of antenna allows a greater amount of parallax because it is not mounted directly on the window surface. However, because the antenna is supported by the stanchion, the antenna must be individually raised or lowered as the need arises. This is a time-consuming and somewhat complicated operation. Also, this type of antenna is very susceptible to wind loading because the stanchion supporting the antenna is of a fixed length. Another type of antenna which has been heretofore designed comprises a reflector which is made of 3e33713323
