How to Remove and Reset RAR Password Easily with Software.Tag: Dining Being able to go to a restaurant and get the table that feels closest to home is not only a joy but it has been proven to help people live longer and have better moods. A project published in the recent issue of the journal Appetite found that dining out that is aligned with someone's cultural background resulted in better food choices, perceived quality and in some cases better moods. "The study is novel in that it shows that even when people eat in a different culture, they still have an increased desire to obtain resources from their homelands," said the senior author, Jordan Wolf, at the University of British Columbia (UBC) in Canada. Wolf and his colleague explained that taste is shaped by culture, which is sometimes shown in food choices and preferences. For example, they found that Americans have a greater preference for sweet taste which is a product of Western culture. The study involves individuals from two different cultures and the composition of the meals is different for each culture. For example, Americans usually eat at 5pm while the Chinese usually eat at noon. In the experiment, researchers invited volunteers to complete questionnaires about the food they ate at a restaurant and how it made them feel. For example, they were asked to rate their mood using a scale from poor to excellent. The first part of the experiment consisted of a psychology test in which the participants were placed in an isolation
