Electrochemical nanolithography of fluorinated polyimide thin-film for manipulation of organic molecules. Electrochemical nanolithography is a powerful nanofabrication technique that is used to pattern nanostructures of almost all types of materials, including semiconductors, metals, alloys, and polymers. Here, we show that electrochemical nanolithography of a fluorinated polyimide thin-film can be used to manipulate a single molecule selectively, using electrochemical methods. We employed electrochemical nanolithography to pattern fluorinated polyimide (F-PI) thin-films, which are formed by the addition of trifluoroacetic acid (TFA) to the precursor molecules of a PI film (KF-PI). A single-molecule probe can be controllably moved (electrostatically manipulated) on the F-PI thin-film surface. The characteristics of the electrochemical reactions and the response mechanism of the fluorinated polyimide to the molecules are studied. The electrochemical nanolithography technique was applied to a molecular selector, such as the electrochemical field-effect transistor (E-FET), and an ionization detector, and to create a molecular array (pattern) and a device for detecting molecular recognition.

Moses Desmond Moses Desmond or Desmond Moses (c. 1620 – c. 1673), was an English-born settler in the Massachusetts Bay Colony and colonel of a company of "red regiment" soldiers in the Second English Civil War. He was the son of Nicholas Desmond, of Wiveliscombe, Somerset, by Penelope, daughter and heir of Rev. Thomas Trevor. The younger Desmond arrived in Massachusetts in 1640. In 1641 he signed a petition requesting the freemen of Boston not
