The present invention relates to the delivery of electrical power to a medical device for use with that device. Electrical power is applied to a medical device by connecting the device to an AC or DC source, or a combination thereof. In the case of implanted medical devices, such as cardiac pacemakers, the connection is typically made by an electrical lead. The lead is typically inserted into the heart through a surgically created opening in the chest of the patient, and is anchored within the heart. An electrical lead has multiple conductive segments which can be connected to either a source or a sink of electrical power. For example, the lead can include a proximal section and a distal section. The proximal section is connected to the source or sink of electrical power and is inserted into the patient at a first location, typically the heart. The distal section is typically positioned within the heart and includes a connector which connects the proximal section of the lead to the body tissue to be stimulated, such as the heart tissue. The distal section of the lead can be positioned within the heart or in the esophagus, the trachea, the bronchia, the intestine, the eye, the brain, or any other body organ or tissue. For simplicity of illustration, the lead is shown here as an elongated tubular element having multiple metal segments, each segment connected to a proximal connector and a distal connector. In this example, the proximal connector is a source of electrical power, and the distal connector is a sink of electrical power. More specifically, the distal connector is in electrical communication with tissue, e.g., heart tissue, to be stimulated. The electrical communication is established by attaching an electrode to the distal section. Alternatively, the electrical communication could be established by attaching an electrode to a lead extension. There are many concerns with the use of electrical leads for delivering power to a medical device. One concern is that a lead can short out when there is a sudden increase of the load associated with an attached medical device. This can occur when the medical device generates a large amount of heat or when the user of the medical device exercises vigorously. When the medical device shorts out, the
