A: Because you want to use autocad for.NET, you will need to use a newer version of Autocad than what is included with Windows. You will need to either get the version of Autocad that comes with.NET or you can download the Autocad installer from Autodesk's website. The autocad 2012 installer is available at this link. A further comparison of regression models for predicting LDL-cholesterol in human serum. A total of 29 published regression equations for predicting LDL-cholesterol in human serum were tested using 76 pairs of observed and predicted values. The methods of Leite (1987, Lipids 22: 269-278) and Lavie and his co-workers (1985, Lipids 24: 119-127) were chosen as representatives of recent approaches. The regression model of [N. Shephard et al. (1978, J. Lipid Res. 19: 101-108) and the method of [L. Lavie et al. (1985, Lipids 24: 119-127)] both gave mean errors from the observed values of approximately 3 mg dl-1. This compared with approximately 5 mg dl-1 for the method of [C. Leite (1987, Lipids 22: 269-278)] and approximately 8 mg dl-1 for the method of [B. Salisbury et al. (1987, Lipids 22: 393-400)]. The models of [L. Lavie et al. (1985)] and of [C. Leite (1987)] gave the least biases for the comparisons. No significant difference in the means of absolute biases was found among the individual pairs of observed and predicted LDL-cholesterol levels. The results of the test of the models using a parametric approach and the nonparametric approach of the Spearman's rank correlation coefficient were
