Q: What is the purpose of usercontrol's in WPF? I'm starting out with WPF and I'm trying to understand how to create my own custom control(s) so I can learn how to use them. I think my first hurdle is understanding exactly what a usercontrol is and what it can be used for. For example, say you have an app with a login screen. The app has a window with buttons for login and logout. I don't want to write a WindowControl and LoginButton, and LoginButtonControl classes to go with the app. Instead, I want to make a usercontrol that can be given a username and password to log in to. A LoginUserControl (or LoginButtonControl) can be used by other apps as a login screen for other apps with their own login functionality. Other apps can just reuse the same control. Another app can make use of the LoginUserControl control and not have to make its own user control for login functionality. Why would you use a usercontrol for something like this? A: User controls are used when you wish to re-use a reusable piece of code. Often times, you have some functionality that you want to re-use in more than one place but that functionality may be different in each place. For example, your application may have a bunch of
