Stipends have usually been incorporated into the income statement of a firm, but they may also be included in the income statement of a firm as an expense for the purchase of a distribution for shareholders. If a firm is selling securities to shareholders, it may include a dividend in the income statement as a distribution. Investment into a corporation's "corporate capital" produces a return. This return can be (and usually is) provided in the form of dividends or "dividend income". However, the return to the investor can also be in the form of stock appreciation. If the firm wishes to maintain ownership of its capital, it must find a way to
